FOREWORD TO THE FIRST EDITION

It gives me great pleasure to write a short foreword to this international dictionary of trade terms. It has been my experience that even in one's own language there are misunderstandings because of the difference of expression as well as difference in usage of certain technical terms. If there can be this misunderstanding within one country, then it is obvious on an international basis even more misunderstandings are likely to arise, if the exact translation of an expression or term is not clearly understood.

Looking through this very comprehensive dictionary the first thing which amazed me was the fantastic number of terms and expressions that we use in the printing and allied industries! It would take a real expert to know whether the author has left anything out and it seems to me a wonderfully comprehensive work. The second point I note is the very clear description of the terms. So far as the English version is concerned, this in itself is an invaluable guide to young people who have just entered the industry. There should be no possibility now of misunderstanding if one takes the trouble to check carefully the term or expression that is to be converted into another language.

I have no doubt this dictionary will be much used by anyone who is dealing with any matter in the very varied and wide field covered by the printing and allied industries throughout the world, and I wish the author and the publisher every success.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

During the years in which I have worked in the graphic industry and especially in those years in which I had to provide the business world with information, I realized how extremely difficult it was for many of my colleagues to understand, in foreign languages, the literature pertaining to their trade. The vastly different technical words and expressions resulting from the tremendous development in the already so complicated printers trade and everything related to it, have come into the foreground in recent years, forming an unsurmountable barrier. Moreover, during the past forty years no extensive multilingual dictionary has been published on this subject. Existing dictionaries are incomplete and out of date. They have never dealt with printing, paper, or ink technology. Where two meanings exist, the lack of a clear definition sometimes leads to disastrous misunderstandings.

In the course of the years I have recorded alphabetically, for my own information, thousands of terms and expressions in the modern languages. When this fact became known – I was called upon for help on so many occasions – it was suggested that I compile my notes and have them published.

To aid in the completion of my work, I have been privileged in having recourse to the library of the Research Institute for the Printing and Allied Industries TNO. This library comprises most modern literature and prominent trade papers. My book, for which I feel there is a great need, is supported by all this valuable information. One may wonder at the fact that the book contains many physico-chemical terms and comments on what many people may consider an old or nearly outdated procedure. But the present stems from the past and this dictionary contains innumerable entries concerning both the present and the future. While the printer transfers ink to paper, either in text form or as a picture, the materials he needs are manufactured by others. It is just these materials which are affected by a number of properties, not immediately perceptible, but presenting problems at the most inopportune moments. It therefore speaks for itself that one should be familiar with the methods of producing these materials as well as their properties and defects. This work is absolutely necessary to eliminate such problems.

In recent years the printing industry has changed considerably. Doubtlessly it will continue to do so. The publisher and I are fully aware, therefore, that the day will come when this book will become outdated. In the meantime it will be a valuable aid in the exchange of data and technical information.

I shall be glad to receive any comments on, or additions to, my work.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION

The first edition of this dictionary, published in October 1967, has received a very kind reception, some have even gone so far as to designate it as the 'Bible' or the 'Widge' of the printing industry. The available supply being soon exhausted, the book was reprinted at the end of 1968. In that edition some minor corrections have been made.

I am glad that my son Ernest has joined me in preparing the new edition. He has a broad experience in printing and publishing. In this revised and enlarged edition some changes have been made in the text and many new supplementary articles included.

We would like to express our thanks to Mr Georges Baudry, Ingénieur A. et M., of Paris, Mrs Dr Diana Liberatori of the Ente Nazionale per la Cellulosa e per la Carta, of Rome, who accepted the responsibility for checking and completing part of the Italian, to Mr Enrique Tormo Freixes, Conservador del Museo del Libro y Artes Gráficas, of Barcelona, who checked and completed part of the Spanish, and to Mr Günter Wadewitz, Dr phil, Dr habil, of the Institut für Graphische Technik, of Leipzig, who checked and completed part of the German.

Reader's suggestions for additions and amendments to the dictionary will be welcomed.

A SHORT HISTORY OF PRINTING

The East. – Printing as western civilization knows it began in the middle of the 15th century in Mainz, Germany. The Chinese, Japanese and Koreans knew and used printing long before that time. The earliest extant samples of printing are Buddhist charms produced on the order of the empress Shotoku before 770 in Japan, supposedly in the quantity of 1,000,000. It is not known what material was used for the blocks from which these were printed; copper, wood, but also stone (steatite) are among the materials suggested by various scholars. But the charms themselves are well authenticated and can be seen in several American museums and private collections. The British museum treasures another famous printing relic, known as the Diamond Sutra roll. This roll was found by Sir Aurel Stein in 1900 in a wall cave at Tunhuang in China and is the oldest dated book in existence. It is a block-printed roll, 4.87 m long and 30.5 cm wide, and bears a printing date corresponding to May 16, 868, at its end.

Block printing is the classical form of Chinese printing. In 969, playing cards are first mentioned; between 971 and 983, the Tripitaka, the Buddhist canon, was printed. This enormous undertaking required the cutting of 130,000 wooden blocks. During the Sung dynasty (960–1279), Chinese block printing reached its peak. The great dynastic histories and the Chinese classics printed in this period have never been surpassed in quality. Less propitious was the application of block printing to the production of paper money; at about 1100, China experienced its first great inflation. Printing therewith definitely established itself as a force in religion, philosophy, history and economics.

Block printing was not the only Chinese contribution to printing. Between 1041 and 1049, a 'common man' (often erroneously designated a smith), Pi Sheng, made movable types of earthenware. For printing, he covered an iron plate with a mixture of resin, wax and paper ashes. On this thermoplastic base, he assembled his crockery type in an iron frame, warmed the base until the adhesive mixture melted and leveled his types by pressing them in the base. Pi Sheng's invention was improved by others, but neither his earthen types nor another kind made from tin and kept in place by stringing on wire, became generally used, possibly because of the lack of a suitable ink.

Chinese efforts toward typography continued. Wooden type was used about 1300; movable metal type was first used in Korea in 1241, and a Korean book of 1377 states that it was printed with movable type. The art of type casting was advanced in Korea with great energy on the initiative of the crown and in 1403, a governmental type foundry was established. Ten founts of type were cast in Korea between 1403 and 1516. From Korea type casting spread to China and Japan. But in spite of all enthusiasm and governmental support, movable type did not dislodge block printing, which remained the Chinese printing technique par excellence until modern times.

Block printing and movable type. – Why did the Chinese prefer block printing to movable type? Several reasons are given. One is the Chinese form of writing; our alphabet consists of 26 letters, the Chinese use thousands of ideograms. Another reason is the Chinese love for calligraphy, the art of fine writing, which can best be expressed in block printing. Some scholars emphasize the different function of printing in Chinese civilization. There, printing served to preserve the classics in the approved and standardized version; western printing was more concerned with dissemination of knowledge than with its pristine pureness. Finally, it is often stated that the lack of a suitable ink was the main reason for the failure of movable metal types. But this argument is not convincing if one considers that many books were printed in Korea, China and Japan with movable metal types.

This is not to say that technological reasons should be excluded. On the contrary, block printing was excellently suited for a handicraft technology. The original writing is done by a calligrapher on thin, transparent paper. This original is pasted face down to the perfectly planed surface of a pear or jujube board large enough for two pages. The paper is rubbed off but the inked image remains on the board and guides the workman in cutting away the non-printing areas. The finished block is a relief printing plate. Chinese printing ink is made of lamp black and a water-soluble binder; it has brushing consistency. The worker inks the block with a brush, lays the paper on the inked surface and takes the impression by brushing gently with a dry brush. The paper is printed one side only, two pages to the sheet. For binding, it is folded in the centre, unprinted sides inward, printed sides out and bound along its edges. Chinese books bound in this manner can easily be mistaken for uncut books. Block printing goes fast; a printer can produce approximately 2,000 sheets in a full day's work.

If we compare Chinese block printing and western typographic printing, we find that both are relief printing, but there the similarity ends. Apart from the difference between movable type and the custom-made block, we notice two other striking differences; the absence of a printing press in block printing and the fact that the paper cannot be printed on both sides. Chinese and western printing both produce a printed sheet but they arrive at this result by an entirely different technique. The west had knowledge of Chinese block prints in the form of paper money and playing cards. But Thomas Francis Carter to whose studies we owe most of our first systematical knowledge of Chinese printing, sees no evidence for western knowledge of Chinese printing techniques and, in particular, not of Chinese movable types before the western invention of printing. China's main contribution to western printing was the invention of paper; printing itself developed in the west under fundamentally different conditions and consequently, along fundamentally different lines.

The invention of printing in the West. – The literature on the invention of printing is enormous. D. C. McMurtrie's bibliography on the invention, edited in Chicago, 1942, lists more than 3,000 items. The lack of clear and incontrovertible evidence, the high esteem in which this invention was held by men of learning from the very beginning, and last but not least, nationalism, provincialism and localism resulted in a steady controversy in which the honour of having invented printing was claimed for many people and many cities. Modern bibliographical research has eliminated most of these trumped-up claims and resulted in the more or less general acceptance of Johann Gutenberg (1398–1468) as the inventor of printing. But the fact remains that there is no direct and authentic report on the invention; bibliographical research has not changed this situation but devoted itself to the study of detail. The archives and libraries were searched for documents, books and other early products of the press. The material has been examined, evaluated and correlated with infinite care and ingenuity. The discussion of the origin of printing has thereby not ceased; it has only become more specialized.

Semantics plays an unfortunate role in this discussion. People, and scholars are people too, have different things in mind when they speak of the 'invention of printing'. Some see the crux of the invention in the printed book and point out that the Chinese had printed books when the west was still in the throes of the dark ages. Others put the emphasis on movable type and insist that the honour belongs to a Dutch printer whose work is much more primitive than that connected with Gutenberg and therefore assumedly preceded this. Because Laurens Janszoon Coster of Haarlem, Holland (1405–1484) is the only man whose name can be connected with these prints, he is considered by some scholars the first inventor of printing.

Theodore Low de Vinne (1828–1914), the great American printer, was the first to redefine the meaning of the so-called invention of printing. For him, the key of the invention lies neither in the printed page, nor in movable metal type but in the adjustable type mould. The accent is on adjustable and not on mould, because only by means of the adjustable type mould did it become possible to make type with the precision necessary for typography and printing. Those who share his point of view distinguish emphatically between the adjustable type mould and the mould used in sand casting. The Korean types were sand-cast, and so were the types used by Coster. Prof. Gustav Zedler has studied the early Dutch prints down to their very minutiae. He too concedes that Coster could never have produced the kind of type indispensable for printing. In the final analysis, Zedler accepts De Vinne's opinion and attributes the invention of the adjustable type mould and therewith of western printing to Gutenberg.

Once the crucial role of type became recognized, it was studied extensively, so extensively that it sometimes looks as if type were all that is needed for printing. This is a grave mistake. All of printing needs four elements without the existence and combination of which printing is simply impossible. In letterpress, these four elements are: type, press, printing ink and paper. Type converts the written word into printable form; the press is the machine in which the type image is transferred to the paper by means of printing ink. Of these four indispensable elements, Gutenberg found only one ready and available, paper. The other three did not exist and had to be invented.

Many students are so overawed by the importance of type that they are inclined to belittle the rest. Zedler, for example, believes that any intelligent craftsman must have been capable of inventing the press. Our knowledge of Gutenberg's press is indeed non-existent, nor do we know to what extent later presses represent his original design or improvements. But it is known that some of the work printed in his lifetime and by men who worked with him are marvels of perfection. It is, in this context, of no consequence that presses for making cheese and wine and for bookbinding and papermaking were known at the time of Gutenberg. Nor can the invention of printing ink be reduced to almost nothing by the fact that artists' oil paints were already in existence. The invention of printing was a technical achievement without precedent. It was much more than the invention of a single object or a machine; it was the development of a complete manufacturing process. This development included artistic design (type face and page layout), engraving (punch cutting), metallurgy (type casting), mechanics (type mould and printing press), and chemistry (printing ink). Any one of the many inventions made by Gutenberg and the men who worked with him would fill the development department of a big contemporary industrial organization with pride.

In the light of our own mass-production society, we can recognize in the invention of printing the first example of our own manufacturing techniques: standardized mass production by means of assembling interchangeable parts designed and manufactured for precision fit. Detroit was anticipated in Mainz about 1450. Gutenberg was certainly the first modern industrial genius.

Early printers. – The timeliness of the invention of printing is evidenced by its rapid diffusion. From Mainz, it spread not only to other German cities, but also to Italy, Spain, France, Austria and even Turkey. By the end of the 15th century, printing presses were established in all major European cities. William Caxton (1422–1491) introduced printing in England in 1476. He was a business man who had spent most of his adult years abroad, mainly in the Low Countries and France. All his life a book lover and collector, he became finally a translator and printer. Caxton learned the new art of printing between 1471 and 1472 in Cologne, Germany, and began printing at Bruges, Belgium, in 1474 or 1475 in association with Colard Mansion, a calligrapher. Then he returned to England and set up his press at Westminster. Caxton, in contrast to the German printers, printed in his vernacular language, English, and not in Latin. A gentleman of independent means, he ran his press neither for the church nor exclusively for profit, but rather for his own pleasure.

The centres of printing were, during the 15th century and well into the 16th century, in Germany at Mainz, Frankfurt, Nürnberg, Augsburg and Cologne; in France, at Paris and Lyons; in Italy, at Venice and Rome, and in Switzerland at Basle. The printer of the incunabula period, the time up to the end of the 15th century, was a man of many talents. He understood not only composition and printing but was also his own ink chemist and press builder. In addition, he was often type designer, cutter and caster. The new art of printing attracted men of different interests, ability and character. Some, like Aldus Manutius of Venice (1450–1515) and Henri Estienne (Stephanus) of Paris (1460–1520), were classical scholars; others, such as Peter Schoeffer in Mainz (1425–1502) and Nicolas Jenson in Venice (1420–1480), were great type and book designers. But there is also the financier, like Johann Fust (1400–1466), Gutenberg's backer, and the business man of great organizing ability like Anton Koberger of Nürnberg (1440–1513). Competition in the 15th century was already keen and ethics were sometimes rather questionable. The great Nürnberg Chronicle of 1493, for example, had more than 1,800 woodcuts but only about 600 wooden blocks. Cynically, kings and popes were here not only chips but even prints off the same block. Bartholomew Troll of Lyons earned the self-bestowed epithet of 'the honest book-seller' by being a less honest printer; he shamelessly pirated Aldus' editions of the classics.

The output of 15th-century printing consisted mainly of religious, theological, philological, legal and classical books. But the press worked also for the day's necessities. Letters of indulgence, papal bulls, treaties, calendars and commercial announcements are among the so-called ephemera of printing. The great social power of the new art was generally recognized at its very beginning, though not always with enthusiasm. In 1501 Pope Alexander VI issued a bull against the unlicensed printing of books; the Index Librorum Prohibitorum has been continuously published since 1559 and is still serving Roman Catholics as their reading guide.

The decline of printing. – The 16th century saw Europe in upheaval. In 1517 Martin Luther nailed his 95 Theses to the door of the castle church at Wittenberg, Germany. The Reformation began and with it the ascendance of printing to the role of a crucial political and cultural power. The high and mighty who were the patrons of printing during the 15th century became its scared enemies during the 16th century. The character of printing changed; its Golden Age was over. The decline of printing was nowhere worse than in France where it had reached its greatest height. There, the religious intolerance of the Sorbonne, which officially controlled the intellectual life of France, had a catastrophic effect on printing. Every printer was under suspicion as a potential heretic. The fate of Etienne Dolet, the Lyonnaise scholar-printer who was convicted of heresy, tortured and burned at the stake in 1546, was equally possible for every other printer. Many fled the country. The best-known of them is Christophe Plantin (1514–1589), who migrated to Antwerp, Belgium, and founded a printing business in 1549 that existed until 1876 and was finally converted by the city of Antwerp into a museum. Printing deteriorated so much in France that Cardinal Richelieu had to send to Holland for first-rate compositors, pressmen and inkmakers when he wanted to start the royal printing office at the Louvre in 1640. The lead in printing passed to the Dutch who kept it until the end of the 18th century, if not longer.

In England printing remained free for the first 80 years of its history. The chartering of the Stationers' company in 1556 was the first governmental device for controlling and licensing. The Star Chamber decree of 1586 further tightened the screws. All printing was now restricted to the two universities (Oxford and Cambridge) and the City of London; there it was frozen at its then existing level of 21 shops with a total of 53 presses. The worst Star Chamber decree was given in 1637. This time, type founding was recognized as a separate branch and specifically controlled. The result was that England became completely dependent for type on the Dutch. John Milton's famous 'Areopagitica' was directed against the partial renewal of this decree in 1643; it took more than 50 years longer, until 1695, before printing was again free in England.

The western hemisphere. – In the new world, printing began in Mexico City in 1530s. Lima, Peru, had its first press in 1584. More than 50 years later, in 1638, the first press was set up in North America at Cambridge, Massachusetts, by Stephan Daye, assisted by his son Matthew. The first two products of this press, which came under the control of Harvard college, were the 'Freeman's Oath' and 'An Almanac for 1639, calculated for New England by Mr. William Pierce, Mariner'. There are no copies of these two; the 'Bay Psalm Book' (The whole Booke of Psalms, faithfully translated into English Metre) of 1640 is the Earliest extant North American book. Another interesting item is the Indian Bible, the first American printing of the scriptures, translated by the missionary Rev. John Eliot into Indian. Samuel Green and Marmaduke Johnson printed it at Cambridge in 1663.

Printing spread with colonization. William Bradford started in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, in 1685 and moved to New York in 1693. William Nuthead began printing in Jamestown, Virginia, in 1682, but was not permitted to continue and moved to Maryland in 1685. The first printer of Connecticut was Thomas Short who set up a press at New London in 1709; William Bradford also is supposed to have started printing in Perth Amboy, New Jersey, and therewith became the first printer of three states. Rhode Island's first printer was Benjamin Franklin's brother, James (1727); printing began in 1731 in South Carolina; in 1749 in North Carolina and in 1756 in New Hampshire. Isaiah Thomas, himself a successful printer and the first historian of printing in America, tells us that in 1775, 50 printers were active in the 13 colonies. The stamp tax on newspapers and advertising was one of the main stimuli for the American independence movement. Printing proved its political power for the second time in the world's history; the book was the intellectual foundation of the Reformation; the newspaper and pamphlet prepared the American War of Independence.

The 18th century. – At the end of the 18th century, printing was in a state of transformation. The American and French revolutions freed the energies of millions; everything was in flux and printing too had to change if it wanted to satisfy the needs of the times. Of the four indispensable elements that are combined in printing, image carrier, press, ink and paper, the press was most in need of modernization. (Printing-image carrier is here used as a generic term for not only type but for plates, cuts, cylinders, etc.) The printing press on which all western printing was done from the middle of the 15th century to the beginning of the 19th century was a wooden structure equipped for repetitive performance of two related motions. All presses known before the printing press had one motion only: up and down. The printing press had in addition a second motion: in and out. Both motions are reciprocating and at a 90° angle to each other. The up-and-down motion supplied the pressure necessary for ink transfer from the type forme to the paper; the in-and-out motion positioned the forme with the paper on top for the making of the impression. The impression itself came about by pulling a lever that turned a spindle and thereby pressed a platen against the inked forme-paper assembly underneath it. After pulling, the platen was raised and the forme-paper assembly cranked out from under the platen.

Feeding the paper was done by placing it on a frame covered with vellum and equipped with adjustable points. This frame was known as the tympan. The paper was laid on, and the points served as guides to ensure registration of the back, i.e., printing in the same area on both sides of the sheet. The frisket was hinged to the tympan and protected the paper from all non-printing parts of the forme. The forme was inked by beating it with two ink balls. Then the paper was put on the tympan, the frisket over it and both on top of the forme. The carriage was run in, the lever pulled, the carriage run out and the printed sheet removed. Hand printing was primitive and cumbersome, but not as inefficient as one might think. In the American colonial period, a team of two men produced 2,000 sheets 38 cm by 50.8 cm in a ten-hour day. Considering that each sheet required two pulls because the press was not strong enough to print the whole forme in one, we must look with respect at this production.

If we look at 18th-century printing in the light of contemporary printing techniques, we are inclined to believe that printing did not develop at all for the first 350 years of its existence. At the end of the 18th century, type was still cast with the same tools as had been used in very early times and the printing press was still the same old wooden-screw press. But there had nevertheless been constant though slow progress. It consisted in improving tools and methods rather than in revolutionary change. The fact that the output of a day's work at the press was 2,000 sheets at the end of the 18th century whereas it is assumed not to have been more than 300 in the 15th, speaks for itself.

Development of modern presses. – This wooden hand press was the point of departure in the development of modern high-speed printing machinery. In this development, we can distinguish two different avenues of approach. One group of inventors wanted to maintain the basic design of the hand press but to improve its power and therewith its speed and size, or expressed in modern terms, its general efficiency. Whether Willem Janszoon Blaeu (1571–1638) of Amsterdam, the famous Dutch map printer, greatly improved the wooden press as Joseph Moxon thought, and as many writers on printing history have since asserted, or whether the Dutch in general produced better presses, as Lawrence C. Wroth maintained, will not be decided here. The essential steps in the improvement of the hand press were to replace wood with metal and to design every part on the basis of theoretical mechanics. The first man to do so was Wilhelm Haas (1741–1800) of Basle in 1772. But the Basle guilds prevented the exploitation of this press, and it took a quarter of a century until different inventors developed workable iron hand presses. Etienne Anisson-Dupéron in France, Lord Stanhope in England, George Clymer in America and many others did notable work in this field.

The other avenue of approach was much more radical. It tried to connect both motions of the press, the vertical of the platen and the horizontal of the carriage in such a manner that they would form a complete cycle. The first record of this idea exists in the notebooks of Leonardo da Vinci in the 16th century. Friedrich Koenig from Saxony more than 200 years later not only conceived it independently again but also developed it to the point of practical performance. (The English writer and inventor William Nicholson anticipated many later printing developments in his patent of 1790 but never executed his ideas). On November 29, 1814, 'The Times' (London) proudly announced that the issue in the reader's hand was the 'result of the greatest improvement connected with printing since the discovery of the art itself'; the issue was printed on Koenig's flat-bed steam press. The great revolution of printing had begun. The newspaper was the strongest force behind printing progress in the 19th century. It was obvious that rotary printing was an absolute necessity for the newspaper's insatiable hunger for speed and production. How the problem of rotary printing was solved is one of the great sagas of 19th-century industrial development. Paper, ink, but most of all, stereotyping had to be radically changed before a successful newspaper press could be achieved. In 1869, 55 years after the debut of Koenig's steam press, 'The Times' (London) could ring the gong again. In the Walter press, it had achieved the prototype of the modern newspaper press; it printed on a continuous roll of paper from curved stereotypes. In the next decade, Richard Hoe of New York improved and developed newspaper printing by making it possible to deliver the completed newspaper folded and counted, ready for sale.

The spectacular development of the newspaper press should not allow us to forget that of the job press. Job work was and still is the domain of the small print shop. It took longer until this field could support presses of its own. The first attempt in the direction of the specialized job press was made by Johann Gottfried Freytag of Gera, Saxony, in 1777 and 1778. He made a treadle press that functioned, but he could not overcome the opposition of the guilds. The first successful job press (completed 1839) was the work of a Boston printer, Stephen P. Ruggles. His 'engine press' took the vertical motion and the tympan from the hand press, but it was already equipped with inking rollers and treadle operated. The most important contribution made by Ruggles was the introduction of the vertical bed in 1851. George Phinias Gordon of Salem, New Hampshire, is another famous press inventor. His best-known job press was the 'Franklin' jobber. Gordon introduced the inkdisk (which improved ink distribution) on job presses and also made many other important improvements. His presses enjoyed great popularity in the 1860s and 1870s. The third great name in job presses is the Universal, patented by Merrit Galley in 1863. It was the first heavy-duty job press and had a truly parallel impression. All these job presses were hand-fed and foot-powered. In mid-20th century America, most job presses have become automatic machines that feed, print and deliver the sheet with great speed and efficiency.

Type casting. – The history of printing types is divided into two subjects, technology and design. Both are, of course, related to each other but both have also their own independent development. Our historical knowledge of typographic technology is meagre. For the incunabula period of printing (up to 1500), we rely on inference and comparative study of the printed image more than on tangible type. The only evidence of this latter kind consists of some type found in 1878 in the Saône river, near Lyons. Anatole Claudin, one of the foremost historians of French printing, attributes them to the infancy of printing and concludes that they were cast in a mould. Another kind of evidence on the shape of type, visible rather than tangible, is the so-called turned up type. This is type that came accidentally to lie on top of the forme and thereby transferred its side instead of its image to the printed page.

The first technical discussion of type casting known to us is by the Siennese architect and metallurgist, Vanucci Biringuccio, in his 'Pirotechnia', published in Venice in 1540. He gives a quantitative formula for type metal consisting of lead, tin and antimony and discusses punch, matrix and casting in the adjustable type mould. His descriptions are clear and informative but without any illustrations. Joseph Moxon's 'Mechanick Exercises', the first printer's manual (1683), treats type casting more extensively and is also illustrated.

Hand casting of type was slow and tedious; a day's production averaged 2,000 to 4,000 pieces. In 1838, David Bruce Jr. of New York achieved a practical typesetting machine that made hand-casting obsolete. His machine was still hand-operated but its production surpassed hand-casting many times. Not until the end of the 19th century was type automatically finished as well as cast.

Type design. – A strictly aesthetic approach to the history of type design misses its essentially utilitarian purpose: 'Letters are to be read, not to be used as practice models for designers, or to be moulded by caprice or ignorance into fantastic forms of uncertain meaning. They are not shapes made to display the skill of their designers, they are forms fashioned solely to help the reader'. The writer of these sentences was Frederic W. Goudy (1865–1947), the most prolific type designer of the United States. The history of type design can be understood only as part of the whole history of printing, its technological as well as its social aspects.

It was only natural that Gutenberg should pattern his Bible type on the style of writing used for sacred books in his part of the world. It was equally natural that the German printers who spread the new art to the rest of Europe should continue to use the kind of types they knew. It was not less natural that these types were modified and finally completely redesigned according to the conditions prevalent in other countries. The first phase of type design consists in the adaptation of calligraphy and handwriting to the exigencies of printing. The next is that of typography as an independent art. Both phases may be divided in the sense that one man is a clear example for one and another for the second, Gutenberg and Peter Schoeffer for example; or both phases may be part of a single man's development, as perhaps in William Caxton, between his type one (1475) and type five (1489).

A telling example of how type design changes with the country is the semiroman of Conrad Sweynheim and Arnold Pannartz at Subiaco in 1465 and 1467. The gothic type of the fatherland was blended with the humanistic hand of Italy. This humanistic book hand became our roman type through the design of Nicolas Jenson in Venice in 1470. The contemporary companion of all roman text type, our italic, was born in 1501. Aldus Manutius needed a compact small type and adapted the slanted hand-writing used by the humanists for his purpose. Type cutting became an independent business with Claude Garamond (1480–1561) in the middle of the 16th century in Paris. Religious and political persecution on the one hand, the development of government control and the guilds on the other wrought a change in the personnel of printing by the end of the 16th century. The artist- and scholar-printer died out; the tradesman dominated the field. Printing became dull, unimaginative, routine. Design was completely stagnant, and mechanical production varied with the Dutch at the top and the English at the bottom of quality.

With the 18th century, things improved. Printers regained their pride, and type of good quality became available in many European cities, e.g., that of Pierre Simon Fournier of Paris, of Bernhard Breitkopf of Leipzig, Germany, Wilhelm Haas, Basle, Switzerland. William Caslon (1692–1766) did for England what these men did for Europe. Caslon's types are certainly outstanding in comparison with contemporary English products; whether they surpass good quality type of other countries is open to doubt. The next great name in English type design is that of John Baskerville (1706–1776). His type is customarily designated as transitional, but Baskerville was certainly the first modern man of printing. He wanted paper, type, ink and presswork all to be of excellent quality and perfectly attuned to each other. This concept has become the generally accepted credo of quality printing. Giambattista Bodoni (1740–1813), the Italian master of type design, took over where Baskerville left off and created the kind of type that our texts call modern.

During the 19th century the art of printing and type design fell lower and lower, quite in contrast with the unprecedented progress of printing technology during the same time. The revival of printing is linked to William Morris (1834–1896), a wealthy gentleman, poet and ardent socialist, who set new standards of excellence in book production. His main merit was that of a gadfly; he stung printers and publishers and opened the door again for the artist in the printing industry. Type design broadened in the 20th century as never before; its greatest stimulus is now advertising. The 20th century is also the first in which US designers distinguished themselves in the field.

Composing machines. – Much more important than the improvements in foundry type was the development of composing machines. The strongest social pressure in this direction came from the newspaper industry. During the 19th century, the newspaper grew at a fantastic rate; in number, volume and paper size. It needed faster printing and faster composition. All elements of printing – press, paper and ink – were radically changed by the end of the 1860s; only composition retained its mediaeval character.

The history of typesetting machines begins in 1822 when William Church of Boston was granted the first English patent for a composing machine. He introduced the keyboard principle, but mechanized only assembly; the other phases of the cycle, justification in particular, remained to be done by hand. But Church was also the first to suggest melting down instead of distributing type, a principle later generally accepted. Several other machines, similar in kind, followed and were successful. The Kastenbein machine, developed about 1870, was used for years by ‘The Times’ (London); the Fraser, developed about 1872, supposedly for the ninth edition of the ‘Encyclopædia Britannica’; the Wicks was in production at the ‘London Morning Post’ from 1905 to 1910. The output of these machines varied from 5,000 to 17,000 assembled letters (or approximately 2,000 to 8,000 ems) per hour. Some of them had companion machines for distribution, but most of these caused more trouble than anything else.

The composing machine inventing bug was epidemic. It spread to people in all countries and of many different callings, but it had its greatest victim in the Paige machine. The Paige compositor was the brain child of J. W. Paige of Rochester, N.Y. It set type, justified the set lines, distributed the dead matter with precision and was considered one of the most ingenious mechanisms ever devised by man. In September 1894, the machine was tested by the ‘Chicago Herald’ where 32 Linotype machines were working at the same time. The Paige compositor needed several radical changes, but nevertheless proved its value. The development of the machine was financed among others by Mark Twain, who even used his first royalties from ‘Huckleberry Finn’ for it. The inventor was as stubborn as he was ingenious, and stubbornness is a heavy liability, particularly with financiers. They decided to drop the whole project rather than battle the Linotype. The loss was at least $ 800,000 not to speak of the waste of time and effort.

With the invention of the Linotype in 1884 by Ottmar Mergenthaler and Tolbert Lanston’s invention of the Monotype in 1885, two machines of lasting value came into existence. They mechanized body or text composition; the composition of display type was modernized by Washington J. Ludlow of Chicago, Illinois, who invented the machine bearing his name. When the first Ludlows were made in 1911, the modernization of composition was completed in principle. From then until mid-20th century, the history of mechanical type-setting is the history of Linotype, Monotype and Ludlow machines. The next chapter of typographic evolution began after World War II. Its theme is photocomposition.

Photographic composition. – Nomic composition can be divided into the following groups; photographic composing machines for body and display type, photographic composing machines for unjustified lines of display type and nomic composing machines of the typewriter variety. The whole field is so very active and so far from settled that, at this time, only a rough summary can be presented.

The Fotosetter is the first photographic composing machine for body and display type to be commercially available. It is basically a line-casting machine, the Intertype, whose casting mechanism was exchanged for a photographic one. The circulating matrix scheme of the Linotype is retained with the difference that the matrix is now a transparent image of the type. Justification, on the other hand, is different from the Linotype; the line is justified by increasing all spaces, those between letters as well as between words. The opinions on the desirability of this form of justification are divided. The Fotosetter can change the body size of the type photographically. This feature increases efficiency of the machine and reduces the capital expenditure for mats of various sizes. The uses of the Fotosetter are manifold; in newspaper printing it is employed for display advertising composition that is converted into relief plates by magnesium etching. Four or five other machines were in various stages of development in the late 1950s.

Several machines exist for photographic composition of display type. Most of them produce long bands of paper or film imprinted with unjustified type; all are manually operated. The operator selects, positions and exposes by hand and eye. The resulting print is developed and finally incorporated in the artwork. Machines of this nature are often used by art studios and they have established themselves as valuable aids in the printing industry.

The last group of nomic composing machines is that which takes the typewriter as its point of departure. These machines face several serious problems. The standard typewriter with only one set width for all letters is contrary to all rules of typographic design. Several machines were developed to improve this condition; some have a limited number of width groups, others go much closer to that required for good typography. Some machines have exchangeable type founts, others only one; some have a wider and some a less wide range of body sizes. In most cases, the problem of justification is solved by double typing. One system works on the Monotype principle and has two machines, one for punching the ribbon and another for producing justified type.

The product of nomic composition is either a typed sheet of paper or a direct image offset plate. The typed paper can be converted into an offset printing plate by photographing or xerographing. Direct image plates are of paper treated to be receptive to the impression of the typewriter key through a specially prepared ribbon. They can be used directly for offset printing. This short résumé barely indicates the liveliness and variety present in nomic composition. The field is far from settled but it, too, has definitely established itself in the economic and cultural life of the nation.

Photography. – Photography was discovered by no one man. It was the outcome of the early observations of the alchemists and chemists on the action of light, a subject that belongs strictly to the domain of photochemistry. Although the blackening of silver salts was known in 1565, it was not until 1727, when J. H. Schulze used a mixture of silver nitrate and chalk under stencilled letters, that it was definitely recognized that this darkening action was caused by light and not by heat. The experiments were also done by W. Lewis in 1763. These experiments were important in that, in conjunction with those of K. W. Scheele, 1777, they led to the experiments of T. Wedgewood with silver nitrate on paper and leather in 1802. It was also suggested that silver chloride was more sensitive. These were practically failures because of the very long exposures required, and no means were known of removing the unaffected material and thus stabilizing or 'fixing' the image against light.

Camera. – Leaving for the time being the question of the sensitive salts, we may turn to the evolution of the camera. This was the outcome of the old camera obscura, the invention of which is usually ascribed to Giovanni Battista della Porta, 1553, though its principle had been indefinitely described by Alhazen, 1100, Roger Bacon, 1267, and others. Leonardo da Vinci (1452–1519), described and pictured a camera obscura in an unpublished manuscript. In 1550 J. Cardan suggested the use of a speculum or concave mirror in front of the instrument, and D. Barbaro, 1568, proposed convex lenses and the use of a diaphragm to secure greater sharpness of the images. E. Danti, 1573, corrected the reversed image by means of a mirror behind the lens, a device still in use. F. Risner, who died in 1580, described in his works published in 1606 the methods of enlarging and reducing, and a portable box in lieu of the cumbrous fixed hut in use until then. Porta in his second edition, 1589, of which an English translation was published in 1658, was the first to introduce the use of the convex lens in the camera. Johann Kepler in his work on optical astronomy, 1604–1611, described the use of a concave lens behind the convex to obtain larger images, and thus anticipated the telephoto lenses of the present day. In J. Zahn's book, 1665, there was described a portable camera obscura with two or three lenses, to secure greater brilliancy of the image, and side wings to shield it from extraneous light. At the beginning of the 18th century the portable camera obscura had become a regular article of commerce and was used to obtain sketches from nature. It was encouraged by the growth of amateur artists.

The beginnings of photography. – Toward the end of the 18th century there grew a demand for pictures. Wood engraving was revived and lithography was invented. A simple way of producing pictures was the silhouette, made by tracing the outline of a projected image of the face and filling it in with black. In 1786 G. L. Chrétien invented the physionotrace in which the projected image of a head was traced by a stylus, and by a pantograph arrangement an engraving tool cut a copper plate which could be inked and printed. Alois Senefelder discovered lithography in 1796, but, though it was introduced in Paris in 1802, it was not until 1813 that it became a success and a fashionable hobby. From that date until 1817 Joseph Nicéphore Niepce was engaged in examination of natural stones to find one suitable for the process. Since he was unable to draw, his son, Isidore, undertook this work, and when the latter was called for military service, Niepce was impelled to produce the images automatically. In conjunction with his brother Claude, Niepce first tried photography with silver chloride on paper. The light-sensitiveness of iron, manganese, acids and other compounds was tested, stone, metal and paper being used as supports. Finally, guaiacum resin was tried and then asphaltum, or bitumen of Judea, which had been in common use as an etching ground since the days of Rembrandt van Rijn. This, becoming insoluble in its usual solvents by the action of light, gave not only a resist for the etching of metal plates but also transparent images on glass. A successful result was obtained in 1822, and thus it may be said that the first permanent photograph was made in that year by Niepce. Prior to this, in 1816, Niepce had obtained a positive on paper, probably in silver chloride, which he could not fix.

Three years were required to perfect the process of heliography, as it was called, and in 1826 an etched metal plate was sent to G. Lemaître, of Paris, to be printed. In order that the pictures should be more distinct, they were exposed to the vapours of iodine. The high lights of the plates consisted of hardened bitumen; the shadows, of the bare metal; thus, the contrasts were very poor, which led to the use of tin instead of copper. Lemaître suggested silvering copper plates.

Daguerreotype. – In 1826 L. J. M. Daguerre, a painter who had experimented with silver salts, heard of Niepce's work and approached him to form a partnership. This was consummated in 1829. The work which Daguerre had done with Niepce had drawn their attention to the light-sensitiveness of silver iodide, and Daguerre discovered accidentally that the effect produced by exposing an iodized silver plate in a camera would result in an image if the plate were fumed with mercury vapour. The inventions of Niepce and of Daguerre were published to the world simultaneously by the French home minister in a bill presented to the house of deputies proposing a national reward to the inventors. A full description of their methods was presented by François Arago on August 19, 1839, at a meeting of the Academy of Sciences.

The daguerreotype process was a complete success. In its operation, a silvered copper plate was buffed and burnished to a high polish. It was then iodized by fuming with iodine, and later (1840) resensitized with bromine and then exposed in a camera. At first, exposures of minutes in bright sunlight were necessary; but later exposures were secured in a few seconds under favourable conditions. The development was effected by placing the exposed plate over a cup of mercury heated to about 75 °C. The image was then fixed with a solution of thiosulphate of soda and toned by treatment with gold chloride. The results obtained were excellent when all the operations had been carried out correctly; and the process flourished, especially for portraiture, until it was superseded by the wet collodion process in 1851.

Calotype. – A preliminary notice of Daguerre's success was made by Arago on January 7, 1839. This caused William H. Fox Talbot, an Englishman, to claim priority in obtaining a picture in the camera, and rendering it permanent. Talbot began his experiments in 1834, using the camera obscura with silver chloride and common salt of potassium iodide as fixing agents. A communication was made to the Royal society on January, 31, 1839. But not until a month later did he disclose his working method, which then involved silver iodide with excess of the nitrate, and fixation with sodium thiosulphate. The solvent action of this for silver salts had been discovered by Sir J. W. F. Herschel in 1819. Talbot's process was called 'calotype', and the image was developed with gallic acid, the action of which seems to have been discovered independently by the Rev. J. B. Reade.

The developed image on calotype paper was the exact reverse, as far as light and shade were concerned, of the original image. Such a picture was termed by Herschel in 1841 a 'negative'. The transparency of paper can be increased by waxing or oiling, and so Talbot was able to obtain true copies or positives of any negative by simple contact printing upon another piece of sensitized paper. Talbot's process is the first stage in the real line of photographic development, the inventions of Daguerre and Niepce being bypaths whose chief importance was the stimulus they gave to photographic evolution. The disadvantages of calotype were the somewhat long time required for printing and the structure of the paper.

Herschel suggested the use of glass plates and the deposition of silver chloride thereon. In 1848 Niepce de Saint-Victor suggested albumen as the vehicle for silver iodide. This process, called 'Niepceotype', held its own until 1851, when Frederic Scott Archer, an English architect, published his wet collodion process.

Collodion process. – To a solution of pyroxylin in ether and alcohol, Archer added a soluble iodide, usually with the addition of a little bromide, and coated a clean glass plate with it. In the darkroom, the iodized collodion was sensitized by immersion in a bath of silver nitrate and formed silver iodide with excess of silver nitrate. The plate was exposed wet in the camera, developed by pouring on a solution of pyrogallol containing acetic acid, and fixed with a strong solution of thiosulphate of soda for which cyanide of potassium was later substituted. Archer's collodion process was not patented, and in three or four years it displaced both calotype and daguerreotype.

The necessity for preparing the plates immediately before exposure and developing them immediately after considerably limited the practice of photography. J. Spiller and W. Crookes suggested bathing the prepared plates in a solution of hygroscopic salt, so that they could be kept some time both before and after exposure. This was followed by the use of hygroscopic substances of all kinds.

Collodion emulsion. – In 1864 B. J. Sayce and W. B. Bolton described the preparation of an emulsion of silver bromide in collodion. In 1874 Bolton washed the emulsion in bulk to remove the soluble salts formed in precipitating the silver bromide, and his methods are still followed.

Collodion emulsion was a practical advance on wet collodion, but it was no more sensitive. A considerable increase of sensitiveness was obtained when C. Russell introduced alkaline development in 1862, but the full fruit of this was reaped only with the introduction of gelatino-silver bromide dry plates.

Gelatine emulsion. – In 1871 R. L. Maddox made an emulsion of silver bromide in essentially the same manner as that used for making collodion emulsions but he replaced collodion by gelatine. The matter was followed up by other experimenters, among whom may be mentioned J. Burgess and J. Kennett. Kennett placed on the market a dry, washed emulsion which photographers could dissolve in warm water and use as a coating on glass and thus produce their own plates.

A great amount of experimental work was at once commenced on gelatine emulsions, the records of which filled the photographic journals between 1873 and 1885. The by-product salts were removed by washing. Sir William Abney recommended the use of iodide in small quantity with the bromide and found that this made it possible to obtain faster emulsions with less fog. Digestion, or 'ripening', as it was called, came into use – long digestion at low temperatures being suggested by C. Bennett – in 1878, and digestion with ammonia was used in 1876 by J. Johnson and in 1879 by D. B. van Monckhoven, who employed precipitation in ammoniacal solution as the basis of a process of manufacturing dry plates.

In 1877 the commercial plates of the Liverpool Dry Plate Company, Wratten and Wainwright and B. J. Edwards were introduced; and by 1879 comparatively rapid dry plates were available on the market similar in type to the slower varieties of plates used today.

After this period, amateurs gradually ceased their researches, and mass manufacture became general. Considerable increases in sensitiveness were made between 1890 and 1900, and after 1930 improved emulsion-making techniques resulted in further advance in sensitivity without the undesirable qualities which previously accompanied attempts to increase speed.

It is interesting at this point to record the advance made in photography in terms of the relative sensitivity of the process.

Colour sensitivity. – The silver halides are sensitive chiefly to the blue, violet and ultra-violet rays; hence all other colours are reproduced as dark grays or blacks. In 1873, H. W. Vogel discovered that the addition of certain dyes to the emulsion, or immersion of the coated plates in a solution of dye, increased the sensitiveness to the less refrangible colours.

Following this, J. Waterhouse found that eosin sensitized collodion emulsion, and shortly afterwards J. Clayton and P. A. Tailfer found that eosin would sensitize gelatine emulsions. They obtained a patent for its use in England and France, and their plates were placed on the market under the name of 'isochromatic' plates. In 1884 eosin was replaced by erythrosine, which was found by Joseph M. Eder to be a better sensitizer, and for 50 years erythrosine was used almost exclusively for the use of the so-called 'isochromatic' or 'orthochromatic' materials. In 1902 A. Miethe and A. Traube found that ethyl red, an isocyanine dye, gave strong colour sensitiveness as far as the orange of the spectrum, and in 1905 B. Homolka discovered pinacyanol, a dye of structure somewhat similar to ethyl red but which sensitizes very powerfully throughout the red.

It was now possible to make 'panchromatic' plates, which would photograph the entire spectrum without difficulty, and such plates were placed on the market in 1906.

The early dyes were largely of the cyanine and isocyanine types. In 1920 W. H. Mills and F. M. Hamer found pinacyanol to be a carbocyanine dye. After that time there was great activity in the study of sensitizing dyes, resulting in the present great variety which permit high sensitivity in all parts of the visible spectrum and out into the infra-red. Most of the new dyes were found after 1929 in England, Germany and the United States, and the most important types are modifications of the carbocyanines and the merocyanines.

The first panchromatic film was made by the Eastman Kodak company in 1914, but it was not generally used (for motion-picture work) until 1925. In 1931 a new super-sensitive type of panchromatic film was introduced. The progress in sensitizing dyes made possible the great advance in colour photography since about 1930 and the introduction of plates and films of high speed and low graininess.

Developing agents. – In the calotype process gallic acid was used as the developer, but in 1851 H. V. Regnault of Paris and Justus Liebig simultaneously discovered the more energetic pyrogallol, which actually allowed shorter exposures to be given. This was used also at first for wet collodion, though it was later replaced by an iron salt, and for dry collodion plates. Until 1861 free silver nitrate was an important ingredient of developers, but in that year G. Wardley proved that pyrogallol alone could be used. C. Russell and J. Leahy independently announced alkaline pyrogallol development, the former suggesting also an alkaline bromide as restrainer. Even after the introduction of the gelatine plate, pyro-ammonia was the only developer used until 1884, when the alkaline carbonates became general. In 1880 Abney discovered the developing properties of hydroquinone. C. Egli and Arnold Spiller recommended the use of hydroxylamine in 1884. In 1888 M. Andresen of Berlin patented the use of paraphenylene diamine, paratoluidine diamine and xylidene diamine as developers. In 1891 he patented the use of paraminophenol and its derivatives, especially monomethyl-paraminophenol, known under the trade name of metol.

Photographic printing processes. – The first printing process was with silver chloride and excess of silver nitrate on plain paper, which gave prints with a rather sunken appearance, the image being more or less buried in the fibres of the paper, and daylight was essential for printing. Louis-Désiré Blanquart-Evrard, in 1847, suggested the use of albumen to keep the sensitive salt more on the surface. In the same year Romieu proposed salting with a mixture of alkaline bromides and chlorides containing gelatine and subsequent floating on silver nitrate solution. A few years later the first coat of albumen was coagulated and a second applied, which gave a more brilliant glossy surface. The colour of prints obtained on these papers was foxy, and to darken this an acid was added to the fixing bath, causing sulphur toning. G. le Gray, in 1850, proposed the use of a gold salt to improve the colour, and an alkaline gold bath was recommended by Waterhouse in 1858. E. de Caranza, 1856, recommended the use of platinum in lieu of gold. Albumenized paper made in this way and toned with gold remained the standard photographic printing medium until 1890.

A. Gaudin had suggested an emulsion of silver chloride in collodion for printing-out. This was revived by Wharton Simpson in 1865. Paper thus prepared was introduced commercially by J. B. Obernetter three years later. Humbert de Molard, 1855, proposed to precipitate silver chloride, wash and suspend it in solution of starch or gelatine and paint the mixture onto paper. The same process was revived by W. H. Smith and J. E. Palmer in 1865 and by Abney in 1882. From that date gelatino-chloride or printing-out paper came into general use and eventually completely displaced albumen. Printing-out papers are little used now except for proofs.

Silver bromide with excess silver nitrate was used by Fox Talbot, and J. W. Swan in 1879 patented the use of paper coated with silver bromide emulsion not containing excess silver for development. It did not, however, come into general use until marketed by Eastman and by E. Just in 1883. J. M. Eder and G. Pizzighelli published, 1881, an exhaustive paper on gelatino-chloride of silver with development, and the former, two years later, described a chlorobromide emulsion. Chloride developing paper was introduced by A. Marion in England under the name of Alpha in 1889, and by Leo Baekeland in America as Velox. Since then the use of this paper has increased, special types, including a great variety of surface, being used for amateur and professional work. Modern papers are of the bromide and chlorobromide types mainly for enlargements.

Non-silver printing processes. – Robert Hunt was the first to utilize the light-sensitiveness of ferric oxalate in combination with a platinum salt in the hope of obtaining images in that metal. But the process was a failure because he did not recognize that the ferrous salt, formed by the action of light, must form a complex salt in order to reduce the platinum salt to the metallic state. W. Willis in 1878 introduced the first workable platinum process. The advantage of this process is that the pictures are permanent. The high cost of platinum and the ease with which development papers are worked has resulted in disuse of the process.

Louis Vauquelin in 1798 had discovered the light-sensitiveness of silver chromate; G. I. Suckow in 1832 observed that the bichromates were reduced by light in the presence of organic matter. Mungo Ponton, 1839, used paper treated with potassium bichromate. Edmond Becquerel 1840, and R. Hunt, 1843, made improvements; but Fox Talbot first pointed out, 1852, that bichromated gelatine became insoluble in light, and this was patented as a resist for photogravure, for which it is still used.

Paul Pretsch, Alphonse Poitevin, Testud de Beauregard, H. Garnier and A. Salmon and John Pouncy, 1859, devised carbon processes, in which carbon itself in a finely divided state was used as the pigment in bichromated gelatine. But they failed to recognize the important point that, as the light acted first on the outer surface of the gelatine, those parts underlying the half tones and high lights would still be soluble; hence, on developing with warm water, they would have no anchorage to the support and would be washed away. J. W. Swan in 1864 patented the production of carbon or pigment prints by transfer of the exposed pigmented tissue to a temporary support, on which it was developed from the back. His process is in use today, and its long scale of gradation, the possibility of using pigments of any colour and the stability of the pictures are much in its favour, though the necessity of day- or arc-light for printing is against it.

T. Manly, 1905, patented a pigment process in which a developed silver print was squeegeed into contact with pigmented tissue saturated with potassium ferricyanide and bichromate. These salts migrated to the silver image, bleached it, and the reduction products wandered back to the tissue, rendering it insoluble in ratio to the amount of silver in the picture, as though the tissue had been exposed to light under the negative. A modification of this, known as carbro, was introduced later.

In 1905 G. E. Rawlins reverted to an old process suggested by E. Mariot in 1866. Gelatinized paper is sensitized with bichromate, dried, exposed under a negative, freed from excess salt and inked up with a greasy ink, which adheres only to the light-affected parts. Somewhat similar is the bromoil process first suggested in 1907 by E. J. Wall and worked out by Welborne Piper. This utilizes the principle stated by Howard Farmer in 1889 that finely divided silver imbedded in gelatine reacts with bichromates and renders the contiguous colloid insoluble. A bromide print is treated with a hardening and bleaching solution, fixed, washed and dried, then soaked in water and inked up with a greasy ink which takes only on those parts where there was silver.

A number of printing processes have depended upon the light-sensitivity of salts of iron. The most used is the blueprint process for copying drawings, introduced by Herschel in 1842. Paper is sensitized with a mixture of potassium ferricyanide and ferric ammonium citrate. On exposure to light the latter is changed to the ferrous compound which, on wetting the paper, combines with the ferricyanide to form Prussian blue. In the ferrogallic process the exposed iron salts are developed in gallic acid to give a positive image in dark ink. The ferrous salts formed by exposure to light of ferric compounds can reduce other metal salts to the metal. Platinotype depends essentially on this reaction, but in the argentotype (Herschel, 1842) and kallitype (1889) and the more recent Vandyke processes, a silver image is formed by reduction of silver nitrate by the ferrous salt. In the ferro-gelatine process (A. Tellkampf and A. Traube, 1905), an unwashed blueprint is squeegeed in contact with a moist gelatine surface, then removed and the surface rolled up with greasy ink which gives a positive image which can be transferred to paper.

Light-sensitive organic compounds have formed the basis of many printing processes, the most used being the diazotype process for copying drawings (G. Kögel, 1917, 1920). In it, paper is coated with diazo compounds which are destroyed on exposure to light, development being with a 'coupler' which combines with the diazo compounds not exposed to form a dye.

Colour photography. – In 1810 J. T. Seebeck, in 1840 Sir J. Herschel and later E. Becquerel and Claude Niepce de Saint-Victor, observed that silver chloride darkened by exposure can record the spectrum of the sun by its direct action, in colours similar to those of the spectrum itself. The colours can not be fixed and the method has no practical value.

The first fixed colour photographs from nature were made by G. Lippmann in 1891, using the interference principle, the possibility of which had been pointed out by W. Zenker (1868), Lord Rayleigh (1887) and O. Wiener (1890). In the method, a transparent grainless panchromatic emulsion is coated on glass and exposed with the emulsion in contact with a reflecting surface, usually of mercury. The reflected light gives an interference effect, setting up standing waves in the emulsion. The exposed and developed silver is thus arranged in laminae half a wave length apart, and reflects light of double the separation, giving bright colours. Beautiful colour reproductions can be obtained, but the plates are insensitive and the viewing is not convenient.

The basic principles of modern colour photography are derived from an experiment made in 1861 by James Clerk Maxwell in a study of the theory of colour vision. He photographed coloured ribbons through red, green and blue filters, from the negatives made three positive black-and-white transparencies and projected these in register onto a screen using three lanterns, each transparency being projected by light of the colour by which its negative was taken. The image on the screen was a colour reproduction of the ribbons.

In 1869 Ducos du Hauron published a book in which he laid down the principles which provide the basis for all modern processes of three-colour photography. At about the same time C. Cros published an article with much the same conclusions. Du Hauron's book gives a clear account of the two fundamental processes of colour photography, the additive and the subtractive, with suggestions for carrying them out. The practical development of the processes was delayed for many years until panchromatic plates became available through the introduction of colour sensitizing by Vogel in 1873 and the introduction of isocyanine and carbocyanine sensitizers early in the 20th century.

Modern colour processes are divided into the additive process, which is used only for transparencies for projection and direct viewing, and the subtractive processes which can be used for transparencies and also for paper prints to be viewed by reflected light. In both cases the first step is to make three separation negatives of the subject by the red, green and blue light from it. It is also possible to make colour photographs by the two-colour process, in which the separation negatives are made by half the spectrum, blue-green and orange, but the best colour rendering is obtained by the three-colour process.

Photoengraving. – Photoengraving is the generic term being applied chiefly to the making of etched metal printing plates or blocks (copper, zinc, brass, etc.), the design being in relief for typographical (letterpress) printing. Parts of the process are also used in the photo-lithographic and rotogravure processes for the production of plates and cylinders.

The first specimens were produced, as far as can be ascertained, during the years 1859–1862 by Col. James in Southampton, by Gillot in Paris, Angerer in Vienna and Husnik in Prague. The name gillotype was for many years applied in France and England to line etchings.

Photography was not originally used in their production, the image on metal being obtained either by manual design or by lithographic transfer. The introduction of the photographic negative permitted the reduction or enlargement of the original design for reproduction.

'Nature Autotypy', an early reproduction process, furnished copies of natural objects which, while imperfect reproductions in the sense of our present standards, were still good enough to convey the image in multiple editions. Leonardo da Vinci describes the method in his 'Codex Atlanticus' (1490–1519): 'This paper must be coated with lamp black mixed with sweet oil. The colour of the leaves is thinned by applying white lead dissolved in oil, as printers do with type faces and then it is printed as usual. The leaves (i.e. the impression) will appear dark in the depression and light in the raised parts . . .'. Several botanical publications of the late 17th and of the 18th centuries were illustrated by this method and are still preserved.

Niepce's early attempts to etch photographic intaglio images on metal sensitized with asphaltum initiated but did not hasten progress in the photomechanical processes. As early as 1841 daguerreotypes were etched in galvanic baths for printing on gravure presses. Donné was the first to show proofs of etched daguerreotypes; Fizeau, Claudet, Berres in Vienna and Grove in England also etched them. Paul Pretsch in London etched them in 1856. He was the originator of the later spray or blast system employed today in etching and was also the first to discover the swelled gelatine process of which many splendid examples are still in existence. The negatives for his work were usually made by the photographer Roger Fenton, using the wet collodion process; the printing plates were electrotypes moulded from the hardened gelatine reliefs.

As early as 1862 Pretsch exhibited at the London Exhibition halftone plates for letterpress printing. Poitevin, independent of Pretsch's work, pursued the same idea and produced relief electrotype printing plates from chromated gelatine originals. George Scamoni in Russia experimented and succeeded independently in the same process. Swan and Woodbury in England produced the Woodbury-type (1863).

In the development of reproduction processes, it was soon realized that the prime necessity for faithful reproduction consisted in finding a means for breaking up the continuous tones of photographs or drawings, reproducing in effect the quarter, half, and three-quarter tones of the subject. Graining and dusting of the printing surfaces, long employed, did not furnish the answer. Talbot recommended as early as 1852 in his gravure process the use of a gauze netting for breaking up the continuous tones into separate printing elements.

As in most inventions, the credit for the invention or discovery of the halftone process of photoengraving cannot be awarded to any one man.

A one-line glass screen in which parallel lines were scratched on an opaque background is described in a French patent of December 14, 1857, by Berchtold. Burnett published a method of single- and crossline screens for photography. Screens are mentioned in a patent of 1865 by the brothers Bullock. Egloffstein's patent of the same year can hardly be cited as his lines were engraved on steel and his process met with no success. Swan in 1866 also used line screens and so did Leggo in the United States in 1871, Jaffe in Vienna in 1877, Stephan H. Horgan in 1880. Meisenbach (1882) used a single-line screen which he turned at 90° after half the exposure was made.

To Frederic E. Ives of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, is due the idea of the optical V which led to the present crossline screen which he used in his halftone plates, the printing surface of which was a bichromated glue enamel coating.

To the brothers Louis F. and Max Levy, also of Philadelphia, must be accorded the perfected halftone screen (grating) which today is universally used and has not been excelled since 1888.

The Levy brothers coated selected plates of high quality optical glass with an etching ground, in which parallel lines were cut by means of a ruling machine. The ruled lines were etched with hydrofluoric acid and filled in with Canadian balsam. The lines appeared in sharp contrast. The two diagonally ruled glass plates were faced at an angle of 90°, sealed and later bound together with aluminium frames.

One of the important contributions to the halftone process was the invention of the highlight process. F. J. M. Gerland patented such a method in 1883 and the Bassani Company a mechanical improvement in 1925. The outstanding difficulty in the early days of the process was its inability to meet the demands for printing in quantity, rapidity, and the danger of the ink filling up the spaces between dots. This required the use of highly coated, hard-surfaced and expensive paper. In the last twenty-five years, however, the process has been adapted to almost any kind of specification. Newspaper and poster plates are made through screens as coarse as 16 lines to the centimetre and pulp paper periodicals carry illustrations, sharp and full of colour, printed from plates up to 44 lines to the centimetre.

Colour plates. – Photoengraved colour plates are made to represent the subjects in the colours of the original colour photographs of coloured designs or from objects in their natural colours.

The early attempts to reproduce colour effects were the manual painting in of the different tints on black and white prints. Later stencils were used, but seldom for superimposed and colour combinations. The simplest form of colour reproduction followed the manual process and used photoengraved key plates and different plates for each colour or shade. Later shadings and overlapping plates were used to achieve colour nuances and combinations by overprinting.

The three- and four-colour processes used in 1940 are based on a Latin Treatise of 1611 by Dominis who described the additive system of complementary colours. Isaac Newton described light in its colour spectrum (1666). The German Le Blon in 1722, living in Paris, was the first to use three-colour printing with red, yellow and blue printing plates. Clerk Maxwell, the English physicist, was the first to publish (1861) the theory of colour reproduction by means of three-colour light filters. Ducos du Hauron and Charles Cross, independently of each other, published in 1868 their three-colour processes. The discovery (1873) by H. W. Vogel of optical sensitization led to a great advance in the reproduction of colour copy in monochrome by the use of orthochromatic plates.

The brothers Lumière of Lyons, France, gave the craft the autochrome which with other colour records by similar processes often serve as a colour guide when the original painting is not obtainable. Modern panchromatic plates are the result of the successive work of Vogel, König, Homolka, Eder, Miethe, Mees, Traube, Lehman, and other modern workers in the field of optical sensitizers. Colour separation negatives are made today on colour-sensitized gelatino-bromide dry plates or on colour-sensitized collodion emulsion. The old-fashioned hand press in the engraver's shop is now replaced by power presses. Colour reigns and is in steady ascendancy.

Paper. – The art of making paper (excluding papyrus) from fibrous matter appears to have been practiced by the Chinese at a very distant period. Different writers have traced it back to the 2nd century B.C. It is said that it was reputedly discovered about A.D. 104 by the eunuch T'sai Lun, in the district Lu-Yang, province Hunan. It was made from a mixture of mulberry and bamboo bark, rags, fishing nets and probably other vegetable fibres. It is assumed that this paper was made by spreading the pulp on a woven or plaited cloth on which it was left to dry. Two centuries later a change had been made to trays consisting of closely laid bamboo laths joined into matting by hairs or silken threads woven into them at regular intervals. The matting was laid on a groundwork of stronger bamboo rods and was dipped in a vat of pulp. On removal, the water was allowed to run off and the layer of paper was laid out to dry, the flexible matting being rolled away from it.

Paper first became available for the rest of the world in the middle of the 8th century. In 751 the Arabs, who had occupied Samarkand early in the century, were attacked there by Chinese. The invasion was repelled by the Arab governor, who in the pursuit, it is related, captured certain prisoners who were skilled in papermaking and who imparted their knowledge to their new masters. Hence began the Arabian manufacture, which rapidly spread to all parts of the Arab dominions.

The extent to which it was adopted for literary purposes is proved by the comparatively large number of the 9th-century Arabic manuscripts on paper which have been preserved. The material of the Arab paper was apparently substantially linen.

It seems that the Arabs and the skilled Persian workmen whom they employed at once resorted to flax, which grows abundantly in Khurasan, as their principal material, later also making use of rags, supplemented, as the demand grew, with any vegetable fibre that would serve; and that cotton, if used at all, was used very sparingly. Paper of oriental manufacture in the middle ages was usually distinguished by its stoutness, glossy surface and absence of watermarks. Paper was probably first brought into Greece from Asia. There is a record of its use by the empress Irene at about the end of the 11th century, but with one doubtful exception there are no extant Greek manuscripts on paper before the middle of the 13th century.

Paper in Europe. – The manufacture of paper in Europe was first established by the Moors in Spain in the middle of the 12th century, the headquarters of the industry being Xativa, Valencia and Toledo. But on the fall of the Moorish power the manufacture, passing into the hands of the less skilled Christians, declined in quality.

In Italy also the art of papermaking was no doubt established through the Arab occupation of Sicily. But the paper which was made both there and in Spain was in the first instance of oriental quality. In the laws of Alphonso X of 1263 it is referred to as cloth parchment, a term which well describes its stout substance. The first mention of rag paper occurs in the tract of Peter, abbot of Cluny (A.D. 1122–1150), ‘adversus Iudaeos’, cap. 5.

A few words may be said respecting manuscripts written in European countries on oriental paper or paper made in the oriental fashion. The oldest recorded document on paper was a deed of King Roger of Sicily, of the year 1102; and there are others of Sicilian kings, of the 12th century. A notarial register on paper, at Geneva, dates from 1154. The oldest known imperial deed on the same material is a charter of Frederic II to the nuns of Goess in Styria, of the year 1228. In 1231, however, the same emperor forbade further use of paper for public documents, which were in future to be inscribed on vellum. In Venice the ‘Liber plegiorum’, the entries in which begin with the year 1223, is made of rough paper; and similarly the registers of the Council of Ten, beginning in 1325, and the register of the emperor Henry VII (1308–1313), preserved at Turin, are written on a like substance. In the British Museum there is an older example in a manuscript (Arundel 268) which contains some astronomical treatises written on an excellent paper in an Italian hand of the first half of the 13th century. In the Public Record Office there is a letter on paper from Raymond, son of Raymond duke of Narbonne and count of Toulouse, to Henry III of England, written within the years 1216–1222. The letters addressed from Castile to Edward I, in 1279 and following years, are instances of Spanish-made paper.

In Italy the first place which appears to have become a great centre of the papermaking industry was Fabriano in the marquisate of Ancona, where mills were first set up in 1276. They rose to importance on the decline of the manufacture in Spain. The earliest known watermarks in paper from this factory are of 1293 and 1294. In 1340 a factory was established at Padua, another rose later at Treviso; and others followed in the territories of Florence, Bologna, Parma, Milan, Venice and other districts. From the factories of northern Italy the wants of southern Germany were supplied as late as the 15th century. But in Germany also factories were rapidly founded. The earliest are said to have been set up between Cologne and Mainz about 1320. England is said to have obtained paper at first from France and Burgundy. France owed the establishment of its first paper mills to Spain.

In the second half of the 14th century the use of paper for all literary purposes had become well established in all western Europe; and in the course of the 15th century it gradually superseded vellum. In manuscripts of the latter period it is not unusual to find a mixture of vellum and paper, a vellum sheet forming the outer, or the outer and inner, leaves of a quire, while the rest are of paper.

Paper in England. – With regard to the early use of paper in England, there is evidence that at the beginning of the 14th century it was a not uncommon material, particularly for registers and accounts. Under the year 1310, the records of Merton college, Oxford, show that paper was purchased ‘pro registro’. There is, however, in the British Museum a paper manuscript, written in England, of even earlier date than the one recorded in the Merton archives. This is a register of the hustings court of Lyme Regis, the entries in which begin in the year 1309. The paper, of a rough manufacture, is similar to the kind which was used in Spain.

The knowledge, however, which is available of the history of papermaking in England is extremely scanty. The first maker whose name is known is John Tate, who is said to have set up a mill in Hertford late in the 15th century; and Sir John Spilman, jeweller to Elizabeth I, erected a paper mill at Dartford, and in 1589 obtained a licence for ten years to make all sorts of white writing paper and to gather, for the purpose, all manner of linen rags, scrolls or scraps of parchment, old fishing nets, etc. But it is incredible that no paper was made in the country before the time of the Tudors. The comparatively cheap rates at which it was sold in the 15th century in inland towns suggest that there was at that time a native industry in this commodity.

Paper in America. – The early printers of colonial America imported their paper from Europe, chiefly from the continent. The first paper mill was built in 1690 at Germantown, Pennsylvania, resulting from the combination of the needs of the Philadelphia printer, William Bradford, and the arrival of an ambitious German papermaker, William Rittenhouse. Two other mills were established in Pennsylvania in 1710 and 1729, one in Elizabethtown, N.J., in 1728, and the first in Massachusetts at Milton in the same year. Virginia’s first paper mill was built at Williamsburg in 1744 by its first newspaper publisher, William Parks. The first in New York was built at Hempstead, Long Island, in 1768. With imports cut off during the Revolutionary War and increased needs for newspapers, broadsides, pamphlets, records, correspondence, etc., an acute paper famine developed. Under these conditions additional mills sprang into existence, and there were probably 80 or 90 when the war ended. Paper manufacturing was protected in the first tariff. In 1810 there were more than 200 mills in operation making about $ 2,000,000 worth of products.

Bookbinding. – Bookbinding began in the Christian era with the change from the continuous roll or volume to the book made up of separate sheets. Early books are composed of single sheets of vellum at first, of paper later – folded once and collected into gatherings or sections of convenient size. The leaves were held together in the section form by sewing through the centre fold. The sections were held together in proper order by sewing them on to flexible bands or thongs at right angles to the backs. Later books only differ in that the section is usually a large single sheet folded several times so that the outer folds require cutting.

To keep the leaves flat and uninjured, early books, which were large, were placed between thin wooden boards. Soon it was found as convenient as it was simple to join book and boards together, by fixing to the boards the ends of the bands holding together the sections. By the time a leather covering had been added to hide and protect the back of the sections, overlapping or completely covering the boards, all the elements of the modern book, half bound or fully bound, had been evolved. A greater variety of materials is now used, but the principle of construction remains the same.

Early book decoration. – The covers of the book bound lent themselves readily to ornamentation and decoration. Already in the letters of St. Jerome reference is made to jewelled bindings, so that books were being sumptuously ornamented by the 4th century of the Christian era. Costly bindings were often destroyed for their valuable materials; but examples survive, mostly in churches and museums, of books covered or decorated with precious metals, enamels, jewels or carved ivory panels. The earliest is the 7th century Gospels of Theolinda at Monza in northern Italy. Famous examples are the so-called Gospels of Charlemagne in the Victoria and Albert Museum, London, and the Lindau Gospels in the J. Pierpont Morgan collection, New York. Others exist in libraries such as the British Museum and the Bibliothèque Nationale.

These precious bindings are, and always were, unusual; they are mostly found on devotional books intended for royal personages or for the service of the church. The ordinary book, covered wholly or partly with leather over boards, was decorated with patterns of lines or stamps, or both. The earliest surviving decorated leather binding on a book, belonging to the same period as the earliest known precious binding, is on St. Cuthbert's Gospel-book, taken from his coffin when it was transferred to the new Durham cathedral in 1104, and now preserved at Stonyhurst college. This is ornamented with repoussé and painted line-work, and stands quite by itself. The other early decorated bindings are impressed with small stamps in blind (i.e., ungilt) in more or less elaborate patterns, and, apart from isolated examples, date from the century in which St. Cuthbert's Gospel book was found. Fine examples of these bindings were made during that century at Winchester and Durham, and later at Oxford, Cambridge and London. Such bindings with small stamps, supplemented at the very end of the period by roll stamps, were the prevailing fashion in all the European countries from the 12th to the 15th century; but in the Germanic countries, cut leather bindings also were produced by incising a pattern in the leather, the outline being sometimes emphasized by stippling the background.

With the introduction of printing into Europe about the middle of the 15th century the number of books produced suddenly increased enormously, involving a corresponding increase of the number of people employed in binding. The making and binding of books was transferred from the monasteries to the houses of printers and binders, and soon the names, initials or devices of printers or binders are found stamped on book covers. Advances were made in the art of binding, styles of decoration developed and as books circulated freely, were copied in other countries.

Famous bookbinding styles. – About a quarter of a century after the invention of printing, the greatest advance was made in artistic bookbinding in Europe by the introduction, probably through Venice, of gold-tooling from the East, where it had been practiced much earlier. The art quickly developed in Italy and spread to other countries. The celebrated Venetian printer, Aldus Manutius, was the first to give his name to a style in this new art; but in general, the early styles are called not after their producers, who are unknown, but after famous collectors, or reputed collectors. ‘Canevari’ bindings, which have in the centre a cameo stamp of Apollo driving a chariot, were so-called after their supposed collector Demetrio Canevari, physician to Pope Urban VIII. Their real collector has later been shown to have been Pier Luigi Farnese, son of the succeeding Pope, Paul III. Many of the finest Italian and French bindings were made for Jean Grolier, viscount d’Aguisy, treasurer of France in 1545, and bear upon them the legend ‘Portio mea domine sit in terra viventium’ and ‘Io. Grolierii et Amicorum’. Although not uniform in origin or appearance, these are known as Grolier or Grolieresque bindings. ‘Maioli’ bindings are named after Thomas Maiolus, another famous collector of the period, who used similar inscriptions to Grolier’s. Until quite recently he was considered to be an Italian, Tommaso Maioli, but he is now claimed to be a Frenchman, Thomas Mahieu, and identified with the secretary of Catherine de Medici.

Italian gold-tooled bindings were imitated in other countries. In England, Thomas Berthelet, printer and binder to Henry VIII, was amongst the first to produce gold-tooled bindings ‘in the Venetian manner’, while Thomas Wotton, as a collector, is an English counterpart to Grolier. In Germany, on the other hand, blind stamping, especially with panels on pigskin, continued in general use. In Italy itself fine bindings long continued to be made for great patrons like popes and cardinals, but recent investigations suggest that the supremacy in binding was passing to France earlier than is generally supposed. Grolier and Maioli bindings were produced in France under those patrons of the arts, Francis I and Henry II. The royal printer and binder for the former, Geoffrey Tory, who also worked for Grolier, designed a decoration for bindings made for his books, which includes his device of the pot cassé. Fine bindings were made for Henry II, for his queen, Catherine de Medici, and for his mistress, Diane de Poitiers, and from this time onwards French binders and families of binders have excelled in technical skill and initiative. Later royal binders, Nicholas and Clovis Eve, developed ‘fanfare’ binding usually associated with their name. Le Gascon in the early 17th century developed the pointillé style where the dotted line replaces the solid line; and the Padeloup and Derome families of the late 17th and 18th century developed the dentelle binding, so called from their lace-work borders.

In England, after Berthelet’s time, fine bindings were made for royal and noble patrons, and usually decorated with their arms or badges. Meantime velvet and embroidered bindings, common to most countries, increased in vogue and became especially popular during the Stuart period. In gold-tooled leather bindings a characteristic native style was not evolved until the late 17th century, when Samuel Mearne, royal binder to Charles II, devised the ‘cottage’ design, so-called from its walls and its roof appearance. Along with the richly decorated binding of Mearne and his followers, the characteristic blind-tooled black leather binding, with dark, instead of gilt edges, became fashionable for religious books in England, for some half a century. English binding deteriorated during the 18th century, but it was redeemed towards the end of the century by a brilliant and original artist, Roger Payne, who with his fine small tools and original designs, with their proper appreciation of blank spaces, is the most inspiring of the English book binders. During his time John Edwards of Halifax worked on different lines; he was famous for his transparent vellum bindings covering delicate paintings, and, with John Whitaker, for 'Etruscan' bindings, so called from their classical borders and other ornamentations that were carried out in the classical tradition.

Modern work. – The 19th century witnessed the development of decoration by machinery, whole covers being impressed in blind or gold by means of metal dies, a practice which was greatly extended with the introduction of machine-made cloth bindings. But these developments hardly affected high-class bindings. In France, from the beginning of the century onwards, binding and decoration have been more remarkable than ever for their technical perfection, at the hands of a long line of artists; Bozérian, Thouvenin, Bauzonnet, Trautz, Lortic, Niedrée, Duru, Capé, Chambolle, Cuzin, Michel and others.

In England the most original binder of last century was Charles Lewis (Thomas Grenville's binder), while others followed traditional styles, sometimes rather mechanically, notably Kalthoeber, Staggemeier, Walther, Hering, Bedford and the existing firms of Rivière and Zaehnsdorf. But towards the end of the century an artistic revival took place, inspired by William Morris, who was responsible for the modern revival in printing. The practical founder of the modern school was T. J. Cobden Sanderson, who established the Doves Press and bindery; a series of his fine bindings is in the British Museum. His most successful pupil is Douglas Cockerell, whose increasing output, revealing originality, combined with a sense of the craft's historic background, confirms his position as the head of the bookbinders of the 1960s. Mention may also be made of Charles Ricketts, especially for his work on the Vale Press books and of a recent convert to the decoration of bindings, Glyn W. Philpot R.A. A number of women bookbinders, miss Adams (Mrs Webb), miss E. M. MacColl, miss Sarah Prideaux, miss Sybil Pye, miss Mary Robinson and others, have helped to increase the prestige of the modern English school, which has influenced the course of artistic binding on the Continent and in the United States.

In France and Germany, and to a lesser extent elsewhere, besides work on sounder lines, there is an increasing output of bindings which exceeds the true limits of book decoration, partly under the influence of modernist tendencies in other branches of art.

42 absorption tester — Instrument for determining the mean pore radius of a paper. When a strip of paper is hanged in a liquid, the level of the absorbed liquid can be seen. The rate of absorption can be timed. In this way an average pore radius can be measured. Viscosity and surface tension of the liquid must be known, and the contact angle must be 0 or very low. According to Lucas/Washburn the absorption is:  $h_t^2 = \gamma r t / 2\eta$  in which:  $h_t$  = height of column of liquid in cm after t seconds;  $\gamma$  = surface tension of liquid in dynes/cm;  $\eta$  = viscosity of liquid in poises; r = radius of capillary in cm; t = time in seconds. When  $\gamma$  and  $\eta$  are known, the radius of the capillary is:  $r = 2\eta/\gamma h_t^2/t$  cm.

362 Albert effect — In 1899, E. Albert found that if a collodion plate was heavily exposed, treated with nitric acid, washed and re-exposed to diffuse light, a positive image of the first exposure was obtained. This is known as the Albert effect and H. Lüppo Cramer showed that the effect could be observed on a silver bromide emulsion made in gelatine. He used chromic acid or ammonium persulphate in place of nitric acid. Lüppo Cramer found that to produce the Albert effect the first exposure must be heavy but need not produce solarization. The effect can be obtained in emulsions which contain sodium nitrite (compare solarization) when they are developed with non-solvent chemical or prefixation physical developers. Chemical developers which dissolve silver bromide give a negative image, and no reversal can be observed with postfixation physical development.

735 aquatint; aquatinta — Tonal intaglio method of etching on copper or steel by means of nitric acid, by which prints imitating the broad flat tints of India ink or sepia drawings are produced. Also the print produced by the aquatint process. Important as a fine-art printing method but also as a forerunner of halftone printing in general and photogravure in particular. Aquatint produces the counterpart of mezzotint cells, though with a difference. In mezzotint, the plate is mechanically roughened, in aquatint a corresponding effect is produced by etching. To this the metal plate is dusted with an acid proof resin powder and then heated until the resin melts and attaches itself as tiny globules to the plate. The etcher controls the image by stopping out, or by protecting an area with an acid-resist and by varying the etching time. See also sugar aquatint, sulphur aquatint.

whilst in the collotype process use is made of a reticulated grain screen. The copy is transferred to a sensitized-gelatine coating on a zinc plate and developed in water and alcohol and bekaed.

Of the same interest was the publication of the magazine Jugend by Hirt at Munich in 1896, from which originates the German name Jugendstil (*Youth style). 838 assembler routines — Set of computer programs which translates or converts symbolic commands or instructions into the machine language for the computer in question. The symbolic commands are somewhat more abstract or general in nature than machine language, but not as abstract as a higher-level language such as fortran or cobol. Writing in assembler enables the programmer to take advantage of the inherent efficiencies of his particular computer model, as would be the case if he were to write in the computer's own machine language, but the assembler routines will simplify the task, especially when programs are re-assembled, since the locations of the instructions are automatically re-sequenced to avoid patching or branching to a different section of core when new or improved subroutines are incorporated into the program. The subject program is thus written in assembler coding, while the object or converted program is assembled into machine language.

by telegraph, including a stop and start signal for serial transmission. Now used for bits per second in a train of binary signals. For lithographic plate coating solutions, the specific gravity is referred to as density of solution. This varies according to the temperature of the solution. Degrees B = 144.3 (SG - 1): SG. Specific gravity =

1392 bimetallic plate — See bimetal plate.

1393 bimetal plate; bimetallic plate — Lithographic plate in which the printing image base is formed of one metal and the non-printing area of a second metal. Generally, the printing area is copper, while the non-printing areas may be nickel, chromium, or stainless steel. Some plates employ a third metal as a base or backing and could be regarded as trimetallic, multimetallic or polymetallic. Both surface and deep-etch platemaking techniques are used to make such plates. With a plating of chromium on copper sheet, the resist stencil of deep-etch method permits etching chromium from image to reach copper for base of lithographic image; with plating of copper on stainless steel base, surface platemaking methods temporarily protect the image while copper is etched away to give stainless steel for non-printing areas of plate.

1394 bi-monthly — Appearing every two months or appearing twice a month. Since it is not always clear which meaning of "bi-monthly" is intended, the use of *semi-monthly for twice a month is preferable, because it is unambiguous. Since there is no single, unambiguous term for "every two months", this is the least confusing.

1395 binary code — Code that makes use of exactly two distinct characters. Usually 0 and 1.

f code m binaire — d Binärkode m — n binaire code m — e código m binario — i codice m binario

1396 binary coded decimal representation — Method of number representation in which each decimal numeral is represented by some designated binary number. Each decimal digit is represented by a pattern of four binary digits. Thus the decimal number 93 is represented in a binary code with channel values of 8 - 4 - 2 - 1 by 1001, 0011. In pure binary different values for the code channels, for example 5 - 2 - 1 - 1 or 7 - 4 - 2 - 1. A 6-level binary coded decimal (BCD) code was devised as a tabulator card and paper and magnetic tape compatible code; in tape form it has 64 unique code values. Extended binary coded decimal (EBCDIC) was devised to extend the available codes to 256, by the use of eight levels, plus a parity bit.

1398 binary information transfer — See bit.

1399 binary search — System to search a file or table by creating a series of midpoint indices; e.g. to search a table of 20 entries, in order to find the eighth entry one would first compare the argument to the first midpoint index 10. Eight is lower than 10, so the next comparison would be to the next lowest midpoint index, 5. Eight is higher than 5 so it is evident that the entry lies between 5 and 10. That area is then searched until the correct entry is found.

f recherche f binaire — d Halbierungsverfahren n — n halveringsmethode f; halveringsselectie f — e busqueda f binaria — i ricerca f binaria

1400 binary system — In this system use is made of merely two numerals, zero (0) or one (1), sometimes written as L to prevent confusion. The numeral may be equivalent to an on or off condition, a yes or a no. The two *binary digits must be organized into a code to represent numbers larger than 2, hence 4 is represented by 100, where the 1 in the first position represents 4, the middle zero represents two and is zero to indicate that this column has no value, and the last column is zero to indicate that no. 1 is present. Thus 0 = 0; 1 = 1; 2 = 10; 3 = 11; 4 = 100; 5 = 101; 6 = 110; 7 = 111; 8 = 1000; 9 = 1001; 10 = 1010; 11 = 1011; 12 = 1100; 13 = 1101; 14 = 1110; 15 = 1111; 16 = 10000; etc.

1410 binder specks — Specks which give a grainy or textured appearance to the surface of blade coated paper; indicated by variations in ink receptivity or printed gloss and caused by non-uniform coating binder distribution. Specks appear as small dots (usually about 0.7 mm (1/32 in), uniformly distributed over all or much of the sheet area. Can be visualized as one railroad track, the entire width of the machine. This is a drying effect. Ink wipe or print test will verify the non-uniform ink receptivity and/or printed gloss. A light iodine burnout will show a similar pattern.

Under the black lines on the tracing paper no ferrous ions are reduced and no blue colour is produced.

2879 classification of type design — Since 1954 attempts have been made to reconstruct the classification of type designs, of which the system of Maximilian Vox of Lurs (France) has been adopted by the A.Type.I in 1962. This system is divided in nine groups: 1. Humanistics; 2. Garaldics; 3. Transitionals; 4. Didonics; 5. Mechanistics; 6. Lineals; 7. Inciseds; 8. Scripts; 9. Manuals. For Western Germany A.Type.I adopted in the same year the classification of Hermann Zapf of Frankfurt am Main. This system is divided in eleven groups. See especially note to app. no. 2. In the American printing industry the system set forth in the PIA composition manual is widely accepted. This manual establishes eight classes of type faces: 1. old style types; 2. modern-face types; 3. transitional faces; 4. square-serif types; 5. sans-serif types and "Gothics"; 6. cursives and scripts; 7. text letters; 8. decorative types.

2884 clay, China — See China clay.

2885 Clayden effect — If a photographic emulsion is given a very brief exposure to light of high intensity, it is desensitized towards a subsequent longer exposure to light of moderate intensity. That is, the second exposure produces less effect than if the pre-exposure had not been given. Observed originally by A.W. Clayden in 1899 when photographing lightning flashes. It can be produced equally well by any type of light source, provided the intensity is sufficiently high and the duration short enough, e.g. 1/1000 sec or less, or by x-rays. The pre-exposure may be of longer duration if it is given at the temperature of liquid air, because all exposures made at this temperature behave as though they had been made at very high intensity. The density produced by the pre-exposure is not reduced by the subsequent low-intensity exposure. Thus, the normal Clayden effect is not a reversal but a desensitization caused by the first exposure.

3099 collotype process; collotype printing; photogelatine printing US; phototype process — Semi-intaglio photomechanical non screen halftone process based on the action of light on bi-chromatized gelatine. Where the light has affected the glass plate the gelatine hardens; the hardened parts retain the ink, and the soft or watery portions repel it. Reticulations in the surface, finer or coarser as the action of the light has been lesser or greater, provide the "bite" and ensure reproduction of halftones without the need of a screen. Used for art reproductions in comparatively short runs. Collotype is known by a number of names: albertype, artotype, heliotype. Invented by Joseph Albert (1825-1886), an Austrian photographer.

Contact masks for originals are usually negative masks combined with a positive colour transparency. Often a highlight pre-mask is made first. Masks made with the aid of a highlight pre-mask are often called principal masks. Contact masks for negatives are of several varieties. *Positive masks are used for colour correction or undercolour removal. Negative highlight masks are used for tone correction, but should not be confused with the highlight pre-masks used for the same purpose in making principal masks for colour transparencies. Drop-out masks are a form of highlight mask. In the two-stage masking method, positive pre-masks are first made, and the principal masks made from combinations of these with the negatives are neither negative nor positive, but are purely colour-correcting masks. The use of a highlight pre-mask is similar in principle to the two-stage method, but might cause confusion if classified as such.

Photogelatine or collotype reproductions duplicate continuous-tone copy without use of a screen and are said to be continuous-tone reproductions. 3439 contrast — Measure of the degree of increased or decreased density differences between corresponding tones of grey in the original and in the reproduction. The contrast change ratio is measured as the gamma for the reproduction. Identical differences in value between the tones in the original and in the reproduction indicate a gamma of 1.00. Photomechanical films that are used for line and halftone photography have high contrast with a gamma of 9.00 and greater.

3449 control v — The English "to control" and the French "contrôler" have different meanings. This not infrequently gives rise to trouble. In English it implies a continuous regulation or direction, of persons or machines by some means. In French, German and Dutch it implies a brief inspection or check to ensure that everything is correct. Thus, your ticket is controlled at the barrier of the métro in Paris, but on the London underground it is inspected.

4055 decimal comma; decimal point depr.; separatrix — In UK and US, decimal fractions are separated from the whole number to which they belong by a decimal point (i.e. 5.62345). A comma is used to divide each thousandth part of a whole number (i.e. 1,000,000 = one million). In January 1978, the Système International (SI) was accepted in Western Europe. This reverses the roles as stated above of the point and the comma (i.e. 5.62345 and 1.000.000). Whether Britain and the US will adopt the SI remains a matter of speculation. In GB the decimal comma is also used for amounts less than a pound. Express as (new) pence: 54 p (roman, no point); for amounts of one pound or more express as pounds and decimal fractions of a pound: £ 54; £ 54.65; £ 54.07 (omitting p). The (new) halfpenny should be expressed as a fraction: £ 54.07 1/2. See also punctuation marks.

This latter is absolute alcohol, and pure alcohol is therefore 200 proof. The degree of proof is twice the per cent by volume of alcohol. 4363 digital-to-analogue GB; digital-to-analog US — Electronic circuitry which converts digital information, represented as bytes, bits, or words, into pulses or fluctuations of current which can convey variable or qualitative information. For example, a light bulb may be on or off, and this would be a digital fact. But it could be brighter or dimmer, and this would be an analogue fact. Information can be transferred digitally, even on a voice-grade telephone line, as a serial stream of on/off signals, or in analogue fashion, as varying frequencies representing, for example, the effect of the human voice on an electromagnetic diaphragm. D-to-a or a-to-d circuitry can convert one kind of signal (e.g., a bit pattern) into another (e.g., varying intensities or frequencies), or vice versa.

As a class they have less tinctorial value than basic dyes and are duller in shade than either basic or acid types. 4428 discretionary hyphen — System hyphen inserted in long words by a keyboard operator producing unjustified data, or inserted by program, to indicate possible hyphenation points. During the subsequent computer run appropriate discretionary hyphens are used to terminate justified lines and the others are discarded. The discretionary hyphen and the hyphen used to connect two words or parts of a word are allocated different codes on input and a common code at the output stage. This method of hyphenation under operator control is used in some comparatively simple typesetting systems and does not require the continuous use of a display system or a hyphenation program.

4929 dynamic smoothness of paper — When a glass roller is pressed against the paper and rolled over the paper surface it is possible to get an impression of the degree of contact between paper and roller, and thus of the smoothness of the paper. Contact is effected in the same way as in a print made on the press, i.e., this smoothness is measured under dynamic conditions. A light spot of 25 × 50 μm is projected in the contact zone, and with this the paper is scanned. The reflected signal is stored in the memory of a computer. From the frequency distribution the degree of contact and the spreading can be calculated, and an impression of the distribution of the smoothness over the paper surface can be obtained.

revisions desired. It may in many cases be converted to a host computer. Access time is considerably slower than conventional moving head discs (about 1 sec maximum access time as compared to 1/10 sec) and the unit of data storage is much less (about 240,000 characters as compared to several million or more). But the floppy discs are cheap, and may be stored in job envelopes. 6969 Herschel effect — In 1840 Sir John F.W. Herschel projected the image of a spectrum onto silver chloride paper which was exposed at the same time to diffuse daylight. This discoloured the paper by forming print-out silver but, on the area that was exposed to light at the red end of the spectrum, the discoloration was destroyed. Colours could be seen in the bleached region which corresponded to the colour of the light causing the bleaching. In particular, a "full and fiery" red was observed where the red light fell. Now "Herschel effect" is usually applied to the destruction of latent image rather than of print-out silver by subsequent exposure to light of long wavelength. It differs from solarization in that it is produced by light that is not effective (or only effective) for forming a latent image.

When a load is applied to any elastic body so that the body is deformed or strained, then the resulting stress (the tendency of the body to resume its normal condition) is proportional to the strain. Stress is measured in units of force per unit area, strain is the extent of the deformation. For example, when a bar of metal is subjected to a stretching load, the extent of the increase in length of the bar is directly proportional to the force per unit area, i.e., to the stretching load or stress. In general, Hooke's law applies only up to a certain stress called the yield strength.

7150 hysteresis; lag — Difference between the ascending and descending curves in a diagram. With paper, for example, it is the lag effect characterized by never getting quite back to where it started as far as moisture content is concerned.

With magnetic ink printing, magnetizing force and magnetic induction have a cause and effect relationship. Here, hysteresis refers to the lag in build up and fall off of magnetic induction when a magnetic substance is subject to a changing magnetizing force. If this lag is plotted in relation to the value of the magnetizing force, a hysteresis curve (magnetization curve) will be formed. This property is very useful in measuring and defining magnetic materials. Other examples arise in the viscosity or resistance to flow of certain colloids when subjected to deforming forces.

In general, it was found that a continuous exposure of a given intensity and time did not produce the same photographic density as a second, equal-energy exposure, given in a number of discrete increments of the same intensity.

Used for coating paper to give them functional qualities such as decreased water-vapour transmission rates, heat-sealing properties, grease resistance, gloss and decorative effects.

7880 lake — Pigment consisting of an organic, soluble colouring matter combined with an inorganic base, characterized by a bright colour and a pronounced translucency, used in the manufacturing of printing inks. There are three types: 1. The original, a precipitation of a soluble colour on an inorganic base, such as alumina, barium sulphate, to render it insoluble in water. Obsolete. 2. The modern and more extensive type made by precipitating from various coal-tar colours by means of a metallic salt, or other suitable reagent, upon a base either previously prepared or coincidentally formed. 3. A combination of both types.
